Dear David,

Learning about your keen interest in the project "Vegetable Garden", I am writing to offer a brief introduction and invite you to experience it first hand with us.

Aiming to raise our awareness of labour and give us a chance to get close to nature, our school has organized the project. Each class is assigned a patch of field, on which we plant corn, tomatoes, cucumbers and so on. Every few days, we water them, weed the field and record the growth. Better yet, we are going to taste the garden-fresh food produced with our own hands.

Come to experience the mix of education and fun!

Yours,
Li Hua

第二节读后续写（满分 25 分）

However, that didn't change our classroom relationship. Every time he noticed my mind was wandering, he would call on me, wearing the stern look with the same expectations and trying to draw my attention back to class. Unsurprisingly, I still distanced myself from classmates; I still didn't know the answers more than half the time. But I think he knew that I was at a crossroads in my life and that my history grade didn't matter much compared to everything else that was going on. Apparently, my problem needed to be addressed first outside the classroom and then in class.

More lunchtime library conversations followed throughout the school year. They always made me feel freer and although I still struggled, I didn't feel trapped like before. Mr. Gray presented me with an outlet for my pain and frustration; he was always there unconditionally, offering me a pair of ears and a shoulder to cry on. His presence and life wisdom enabled me to become less defensive and open up more. Gradually, the hours spent amongst the library shelves became my favorite time to take his "class". Little as I remembered about what he taught in the history class, the lessons learned outside the classroom would never fade away.
