B

I never thought that one day I would proudly show off my nose on a canvas on my living room wall. As a teenager, I couldn't stand seeing a photo of my nose in profile. I hated how big it was and, if people praised me for my looks, I always felt it was in spite of the most noticeable feature on my face.

I was about to accept that I would never fully see my nose as beautiful when I met Nicholas Baldion, an artist, in a London pub, and asked him to paint my portrait. I regretted this the second I arrived for my sitting. I had forgotten that Baldion would have to spend hours staring at my biggest insecurity, and then painstakingly translating it onto canvas.

The first sitting was hard. I could not shake the feeling of wanting to turn my head to face the front. I hated the fact that Baldion was openly and carefully examining the one feature I had spent years trying to hide. Yet, as the two-and-a-half-hour sitting went on, I calmed down and began to accept my feelings. I had put myself in this situation, so now I just needed to sit in it. By the second sitting, I was almost excited-not just by the thought of having an afternoon when I had an excuse to do absolutely nothing, but because it had finally sunk in that I was having my portrait done.

Baldion told me what he was thinking when he looked at my nose. To an artist, beauty doesn't necessarily reside in a living Barbie doll; it lives in wrinkles, scars, and character. "I always enjoy painting distinctive features," he said. "Beauty is everywhere."

I was nervous to see the finished portrait. What if it was further proof that my nose was unattractive? But when I looked at the picture of a gently smiling woman, confident in her own skin, I couldn't help but smile back. She looked like me, yes, but she also looked quite attractive. Her nose was powerful, strong, and almost beautiful.

The process has shifted my perspective and I have learned to make up my own mind about what beauty means, whether it is a smiling, strong woman in an oil portrait, or a real-life reflection-complete with a big nose-looking back at me in the mirror.

24. Why did the author regret having asked the artist to paint her portrait?

- A. Because she had to pay for the painting.
- B. Because she did not feel safe with the artist.
- C. Because she wasn't confident about her big nose.
- D. Because she had to sit for hours for the painting.

25. Which of the following is NOT what the artist thinks of beauty?

- A. Beauty exists in wrinkles.
- B. Beauty is everywhere.
- C. Beauty is features with characteristics.
- D. Beauty only lies in a living Barbie doll.

26. What changed the author's perspective on beauty?

- A. A portrait of an artist.
- B. Having learned art.
- C. The artist having painted her more beautiful.

D. The experience of being painted by an artist.

27. What is the best title for the text?

A. What Is Beauty

B. My Portrait

C. My Large Nose

D. An Artist and Me

A new type of plastic made directly from organic plant waste has been created by scientists. The new material is easy to make and could be used in everything from packaging and textiles (纺织品) to medicine and electronics.

The researchers in Switzerland have already used the technique to make packaging films, fibres that can be used for clothes or other textiles and threads for 3D printing.

Conventional plastic is so widespread because making it combines low cost, heat stability, mechanical strength and processability, the researchers say. Until now, few, if any, alternative plastics have managed to match or surpass conventional plastic in these aspects, which is vital if they are to be used more widely.

To make the plastic, scientists “cooked” wood and other plant waste in inexpensive chemicals to make a plastic precursor (前身). The sugar structure stays complete within the molecular (分子) structure of the plastic, making the chemistry much cheaper than other types of alternative plastic.

Back in 2016, the researchers found out that if they added an aldehyde (乙醛) chemical they could stabilize parts of the plant material to avoid their destruction during extraction. But now, they are using glyoxylic acid, a solid organic substance that occurs naturally and is used in industry. The team could simply fasten “sticky” groups onto both sides of the sugar molecules, which allowed them to act as plastic building blocks. Using this simple technique, they could turn up to a quarter of the weight of agricultural waste, or 95 percent of purified sugar into plastic.

“The plastic has very exciting properties, notably for applications like food packaging,” Professor Jeremy Lautenbacher from the Swiss Federal Institute of Technology, who created the plastic, said. “What makes the plastic unique is the presence of the complete sugar structure. This makes it incredibly easy to make because you don't have to change what nature gives you, and it is simple to break down because it can go back to a molecule that is already plentiful in nature.”

28. What can be learned about the conventional plastic and new type of plastic?

A. The new type of plastic can be directly made from plant waste.

B. Researchers use the same chemical in making the conventional plastic and new plastic.

C. The sugar structure stays complete in the conventional plastic.

D. The sugar structure is destroyed in the new type of plastic.

29. What does the underlined word “it” refer to?
