One possible version:

Modern technology such as chemical fertilizers and machinery make it possible to provide cheap food. However, some people believe it may have negative effects on people's health.

In my view, this worry is groundless. First and foremost, modern technologies are all strictly tested before they are put into wide use. Scientists are exact and responsible by nature. They do lots of experiments before they can come up with a new technology. And they are especially careful when they try to find the application of the new technology for human purposes. Secondly, history has proved the safety of the majorities of technologies. Fertilizers and machinery have been used to produce human foods for decades. As we all know, human beings are generally healthier than ever before although they eat chemically fertilized produce and machine-processed foods.

In conclusion, food produced with the application of modern agricultural technologies is safe for human health.
