When one door closes to Li, another one opens. Born with severe hearing loss, Li has found her way to communicate with the world—through painting. Moreover, painting led Li to meet her husband Hu at the Changsha Vocational and Technical School. Losing his hearing due to medication when he was 1 year old, Hu is also an art-lover.

Before learning to paint in primary school, Li always felt lonely in a silent world. She knew she was different from her peers because she could not hear. But a painting class opened for her a door to creativity and a way of expression.

Graduating from college in 2005, Li got a job as a typist at a public institute in Zhuzhou, Hunan. It was a decent job in the eyes of her father, but Li was not happy because she could not communicate with other colleagues and the lonely feeling from childhood came back.

In 2016, Li quit the job and joined her husband's company, which specializes in 3D wall and ground paintings, to be a wall painter. All the five painters there are hearing-impaired. "I know how difficult it is for hearing-impaired people to find a job. So I want to help those who are passionate about painting to pursue their dreams," said Hu, adding that the company is more like a family.

As all the people are hearing-impaired, communication with clients is the most common challenge that the team faces. Li said, "We communicate through typed words, which is slow and has caused us to lose some clients." Apart from that, Li is confident about the team's painting and design skills.

Li hopes that their stories can inspire more people facing similar battles. The painter said, "Life can be challenging to the hearing loss community who are somehow excluded (排除) from conversations, but we are not alone, and we can find our way of expressing ourselves."

Japanese archaeologists have uncovered a 7.5-foot-long iron sword and a bronze mirror from an ancient tomb near the city of Nara. Researchers found both artifacts while unearthing a 1,600-year-old site called Tomio Maruyama.

The weapon, known as a dako sword, is so large that it was likely never used for self-defense, serving instead as a means of protection against evil after death. Like other dako swords unearthed in the country, this one looks like a snake. Due to the artifact's size, the researchers initially thought they had found multiple swords lined up next to each other.

Experts said the mirror, which is shaped like a shield (盾), was also likely used to shun evil spirits. It measures 25 inches by 12 inches and weighs more than 12 pounds, making it the largest of its kind discovered in Japan, too.

The finds offer new insights into the Kofun period, which lasted from around the year 250 AD to 538 AD and is named for the distinctive tomb mounds, constructed to bury members of the ruling class. Kosaku Okabayashi, the deputy director for Nara prefecture's Archaeological Institute of Kashihara, said, "These discoveries indicate that the technology of the Kofun period is beyond what had been imagined, and they are masterpieces in metalwork from that period."

Japan is home to an estimated 160,000 burial mounds from the Kofun period, though the Tomio Maruyama kofun is particularly large. Measuring 350 feet in diameter and up to 32 feet tall, it dates back to the late fourth century.

Archaeologists think it has some connection to an influential person who supported the rulers of the day, the imperial Yamato family. Based on the presence of the two artifacts, the dead person may have been involved in military and ritualistic matters. So far, the researchers have discovered a coffin but no human remains in the burial chamber.

28. How did researchers find an iron sword and a bronze mirror?

- A. By carefully studying historical materials.
- B. By asking experienced local villagers.
- C. By searching for much information online.
- D. By exploring an old tomb.

29. What do we know about the iron sword?

- A. It might be used to drive the evil away.
- B. It looks like a sharp shield.
- C. It was mainly used for self-defense.
- D. It is in a very small size.

30. What does the underlined word “shun” in paragraph 3 mean?

- A. Schedule.
- B. Design.
- C. Avoid.
- D. Express.

31. What is Kosaku Okabayashi's attitude towards the two discoveries in paragraph 4?

- A. Negative.
