Dear Thomas

To promote Chinese literature in an innovative way and improve our English, the English Society I am in is to perform an episode of the classic Chinese drama Teahouse in English at the coming Campus Culture Festival.

Now we have to ask a favor of you. Not sure about the vocabulary and grammar of the translated lines, we look forward to you making some necessary corrections. Sorry to put you to the trouble and we sincerely invite you to watch our performance when it is staged.

Your early reply would be highly appreciated.

Yours
Li Hua

第二节 (满分 25 分)(One possible version)

Frank comforted the couple and promised to help them out. Greatly relieved, Scott and Susan expressed their heartfelt gratitude repeatedly. On rectum, Frank posted a notice on their community website, calling on people to help harvest Scott's crops. Hours later, over a dozen farmers signed up voluntarily in response. Then Frank made a detailed arrangement. Some farmers were assigned to harvest Scott's corn and soybeans, some were in charge of bagging the grain and some transported and dried them. Frank even arranged for wheat seeds to be bought and sown in Scott's fields. Everything went pretty well.

Two months later, Scott recovered and returned home. The moment the couple stepped into their house, they could hardly believe their eyes. Inside were neat rows of bags filled with dry corn and soybeans. A wave of warmth rose from the bottom of their hearts. When they got to their fields, they were overwhelmed with what came into sight. Bathed in the bright sunshine, the green wheat was waving at them like long-lost friends. Then from the distance came Frank and some farmers, to whom Scott and Susan hurriedly went over, with grateful tears streaming down their cheeks. They felt lucky to live in a community where people always looked out for each other.
